Leonardo as a Philosopher and a Writer. Humboldt says: He was the greatest physical philosopher of the fifteenth century. If the views of Leonardo da Vinci upon physical subjects had not remained buried in his MSS., the field of observation offered by the New World would have been explored in many of its branches of science before the grand epoch of Galileo, Pascal, and Huygens. He sympathized profoundly with the revival of ancient learning in Italy, and in an epitaph which was prepared for him, under his own supervision, he called himself, The admirer of the ancients and their grateful disciple. One thing is lacking to me: their science of proportion. I have done what I could; may posterity pardon me. He devoted the most earnest study to Vitruvius, whose book on architecture had recently been translated by Fra Paciolo; since the great question of the NOTES AND MANUSCRIPTS. 109 day in Milan was one relating to architecture, when the Cathedral, there approaching completion, was about to be crowned with a cupola. The main contest arose over the question whether the cupola should be of the Gothic or Renaissance type, and was stormily debated by the Italian architects, and by others whom Sforza summoned from Germany. After Leonardo s death, his vast collections of manuscripts and notes were bequeathed to Francesco Melzi, who retained them with religious care, although no attempt was made to arrange these confused treasures of scientific facts,...
